9/10. A chronicle of the life of a young American woman, Storm, who was a prisoner of a depraved German doctor.ref062] of the olfactory epithelium. Also, this study used bacteria collected from the human oral cavity, which we believed was a likely source for the oral GBS colonization. Other studies have tested for association of the presence of GBS in the human female genital tract \[@pone.0149443.ref016],[@pone.0149443.ref024] and the presence of GBS in the gastrointestinal tract \[@pone.0149443.ref012]. To determine whether the oral and genital GBS were from the same individual, it would be necessary to isolate GBS from these sites and genotype the isolates. Unfortunately, the results of our study are not sufficient to determine whether the GBS colonization is from the same individual. The role of the human female genital tract as a reservoir for GBS may be an important factor in the acquisition of infection \[@pone.0149443.ref016]. The human female genital tract is a rich reservoir for GBS \[@pone.0149443.ref016],[@pone.0149443.ref025],[@pone.0149443.ref027]. GBS colonization of the human female genital tract occurs in early life and persists through menopause and vaginal hysterectomy \[@pone.0149443.ref029],[@pone.0149443.ref030]. However, since our study is limited to one time point, it is unclear whether GBS colonization of the human female genital tract persists through menopause or vaginal hysterectomy. Although GBS can be cultured from the human female genital tract, it has not been cultured from cervicovaginal fluid \[@pone.0149443.ref030]. In our study, we did not obtain vaginal fluid to culture GBS; therefore, we are not able to determine the relationship of GBS colonization of the genital tract to that of the vaginal cavity. It is important to note that in this study, we used a collection device (swab) to collect vaginal fluid from the vaginal cavity. The ability of swabs to collect vaginal fluid and the presence of the bacteria in the vaginal cavity has been debated in the literature \[
