The Devil's Rejects (2005) The Devil's Rejects is a 2005 American slasher horror film directed by Robert Rodriguez and starring Angela Bettis, Rob Lowe, Stephen Dorff, and Emmanuelle Chriqui. It is the third film in the four-part Grindhouse project and was a low-budget parody of the notorious exploitation horror genre. The film begins with an introduction to the two antagonists, a pair of ossified serial killers known as The Twins. They stalk and terrorize the town, hunting their next victims, while displaying a ghoulish sense of humor and macabre sense of style. It then flashes back to 1999, when a young couple, Meg and Dennis, are married in the same church where they met in high school. They move to a secluded lakeside house where Dennis keeps Meg at arm's length, preferring to live separately from her. In the present, The Twins attempt to make their way to the house and catch Meg. They are killed by a young, middle-aged man named Davis (who was revealed to be their nephew). Only when his friend Chase — a police officer — arrives, Davis realizes that he is the sole survivor of the massacre. He then stumbles upon the secret of his family, and seeks to find out why he is the only one to survive. He then returns to the house, and learns that it is a shrine to the two mummified killers. The family was the victims of the twins — one of them died in the massacre, and the other was killed in self-defense. The father disowns him, and his wife also throws him out. The second half of the film features a series of flashbacks where Davis learns the identity of the twins, and their true reasons for committing the massacre. It is revealed that they were obsessed with Michael Jackson, and were intent on killing him by any means necessary. It was also discovered that their real name is Ralph and Samuel, but they were never adopted and considered insane, so their real names were never revealed.
