A structural analog of chlorotetramethyltetranitramine. An explosion of interest in molecular structural isomorphism and similarities of inorganic molecules led to the synthesis and characterization of an isomer of chlorotetramethyltetranitramine, 2,4-dimethyl-3,5-dinitro-1,2-diaminocyclohexane, which is a structural analog of the explosive Hexogen. This compound, which was prepared by nitration of 4,4'-dimethyl-1,2-diaminocyclohexane, displays a structural similarity to the explosive octinitroamine, hexogendinitroamine, and, in combination with other synthetic explosives, may be useful as an explosive material. To characterize this novel explosive, we have determined its single-crystal X-ray structure.Q: How to create a random number based on your own probability distribution I have a very simple problem, I know the length of my array of items and have a list of probabilities I want to use. I'd like to be able to select a random item from this list using `Math.random`. Obviously, this is easy enough to do, I could simply do this: `int itemIndex = random.nextInt(probabilities.length)`; but then I have to be careful to make sure that the numbers are distributed proportionately amongst the list, or the probability of being able to find an item (i.e. the probability of drawing from the list, rather than the array) will be un-truely random. I can't just calculate the frequency of each item in the list. If I could, I could just take the `itemIndex` at random and subtract that from the frequency of each number and this would yield a random number based on the frequency of the item at that position. I know there is an N/A solution
