Decreased cell viability was also observed after CA treatment. This is consistent with our previous findings on the inhibition of mammalian cell division by CA \[@pone.0127067.ref016]]. which occurs via the induction of a cell cycle arrest that may be triggered by a DNA damage signal \[@pone.0127067.ref024]]. In addition, the nuclei of E9-treated cells became quite condensed and rounded. We did not observe any accumulation of micronuclei, which can occur as a consequence of chromosome or DNA damage or of the disintegration of the nuclear envelope in mitotic cells \[@pone.0127067.ref025]]. In contrast, we observed the formation of DAPI-positive micronuclei in control cells treated with the single compound, including cells that had one or two micronuclei. This compound-induced micronuclei was not related to apoptosis, as determined by the lack of a positive TUNEL signal (data not shown). In this study, we found that CA inhibited the proliferation of cells and induced an S phase-specific cell cycle arrest. It has been demonstrated that CA affects multiple targets, including RNA and protein synthesis \[@pone.0127067.ref026]]. In recent years, we have investigated the effects of CA and other CA analogues on the cell cycle and the induction of apoptosis \[@pone.0127067.ref017]. \[@pone.0127067.ref018]]. We used the human renal carcinoma cell line, ACHN, and found that the CA analogues, 4-hydroxy-3-methoxycinnamic acid and 4-methoxycinnamic acid, inhibited cell proliferation, and induced apoptosis via caspase-mediated pathways \[@pone.0127067.
