Design of Machine Elements Free.Millions of women just told a really big man where to go. The United States Senate has passed the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution by a vote of 67 to 31. The amendment, ratified in 1972, would guarantee equal rights for men and women. Three-quarters of the states in the union must ratify the amendment before it can go into effect. Thirty-six states need to approve it for it to be ratified. The Equal Rights Amendment is scheduled to be put before the states for ratification in the coming year. The amendment is based on the nineteenth-century Equal Rights Amendment, which was ratified by 38 states in 1975. Four states and the District of Columbia are still seeking ratification. Supporters of the amendment assert that it would be easier to pass a constitutional amendment than to amend the U.S. Constitution. The ERA was ratified by more than two-thirds of the states in the decade following the amendment's passage. Before 1972, the United States had ratified only five amendments to the Constitution. Women's groups have been campaigning for the Equal Rights Amendment for more than 40 years. They contend that women are underrepresented in many areas of American society. Women held only 19 percent of the seats in the U.S. Congress in 1972. Women held only 18 percent of the seats in Congress in 1972, less than half of the seats in the current Congress. The original Equal Rights Amendment would have guaranteed that the right to vote in U.S. elections could be extended to women. Congress has never included this provision in the U.S. Constitution. Opponents of the Equal Rights Amendment, including many members of the American Medical Association and the Christian Coalition, have maintained that the ERA would destroy the traditional family structure and would lead to the decline of male-female relations. They also contend that the concept of marriage
