Antibodies to Endoglin (CD105) have been demonstrated to selectively bind to tumor vasculature and to be effective in mediating tumor growth inhibition and vessel destruction. Our laboratory has generated a mouse model to study the in vivo efficacy of a humanized anti-CD105 antibody, and showed that this agent exerts a potent antitumor effect in an orthotopic mouse glioblastoma model. We have also established that a high level of anti-CD105 accumulation in the tumor blood vessels leads to increased perfusion, and increased oxygenation and an enhanced apoptotic response. The goal of this application is to use this model to determine how changes in the tumor vasculature can be used to direct anti-CD105 therapy to improve treatment efficacy. This proposal seeks to determine how anti-CD105 can be used in combination with other vascular-targeted agents to improve the outcome for patients with glioblastoma. In Aim 1 we will determine the effects of anti-CD105 therapy in combination with agents that selectively target tumor blood vessels and will evaluate the toxicity of this treatment. We will test the hypothesis that anti-CD105 treatment can be synergistic with tumor blood vessel targeting agents, such as the recently FDA approved antibody bevacizumab. Aim 2 will determine the impact of anti-CD105 treatment on tumor vasculature and its consequences for the fate of the tumor and whether therapy can be made more effective through improved tumor perfusion. We will test the hypothesis that there is a direct correlation between increased perfusion and oxygenation and an enhanced apoptotic response. This work will help provide a rational basis for the use of anti-CD105 as a monoclonal antibody-based therapy for cancer.President Trump is going to pressure the Department of Justice (DOJ) and Special Counsel Robert Mueller to end the Russia investigation, after Wednesday's public testimony by Attorney General Jeff Sessions, a White House source says. Trump will view Sessions' testimony as a sign of weakness that he is going to
