Field of the Invention The invention is directed to an apparatus for use by a user to provide more freedom of movement in a seated position. More particularly, the invention is directed to an apparatus that adjusts the level of seat support that a user provides to their back when sitting in a seated position. 2. Prior Art The human spine is a complex structure and the effects of aging, injury, curvature, and even disease can cause changes in curvature, compression and tension of individual spinal segments. Such conditions often cause pain, deformity and/or neurologic deficit in the affected vertebrae. Spinal decompression techniques have become useful in treating conditions affecting the spinal column. One such treatment is spinal decompression which involves removal of one or more disc segments that become pinched or wedged between the vertebrae of the spine. Such disc segments

Calcium and phosphate are important regulators of bone metabolism. We reviewed the biochemical and clinical characteristics of hyperphosphatemia in dialysis patients in order to assess its impact on bone metabolism, to understand the factors associated with hyperphosphatemia, and to elucidate its pathophysiology. Hyperphosphatemia is commonly found in dialysis patients. Hyperphosphatemia in dialysis patients is associated with bone disorders and vascular calcification. Hyperphosphatemia might inhibit osteoblast activity and increase bone resorption by stimulating bone resorption factors, such as parathyroid hormone (PTH), fibroblast growth factor 23 (FGF23), sclerostin and Dickkopf-related protein (DKK-1). Therefore, it is necessary to elucidate the precise mechanisms of hyperphosphatemia. In addition, interventions to prevent hyperphosphatemia should be attempted. Recent studies have shown that treatment of dialysis patients with sevelamer hydrochloride, cinacalcet hydrochloride and calcimimetic analogues was effective in reducing hyperphosphatemia. ba244e880a
