A few days ago I was tasked with configuring a Cisco 9400 router (this is a very old router) and during the configuration the internet access was completely blocked. I added a default route which basically configured all the local internal and public IPs and I can ping all the destinations inside the local network. I then configured a VLAN 23 on the switch port connected to a local computer and configured all the required sub-interfaces for this VLAN (configured the VLAN ID, MTU, IP range, IP address,...). Suddenly the internet access was back and I could ping the entire world. First of all, I was wondering if this should have been the first setting in the configuration, because if I had to set the default route first, maybe the VLAN was already configured and therefore no IP traffic could go through it? Second question, what could have caused this to happen? I'm guessing a reboot? A: You're correct, a router will take a little while to respond to changes, so doing it in a different order can cause the problems you describe. This can happen if you connect two devices at once, the connection can't complete before the configuration is done, or if you have an active connection on the network and the router configs without logging off. The two lightweight heavyweights will now meet on Feb. 18 in the main event of UFC on FOX 18 in Philadelphia. Alvarez (23-3) looked to prove once again that he is one of the best lightweights in the world on Saturday when he scored a stunning first-round knockout over Gaethje (20-0). The result was one of the most memorable finishes of the year. Alvarez claimed the UFC interim title with the win, which came just 19 days after UFC on FOX 17 when he submitted Gunnar Nelson to become champion. A win over Gaethje would move him closer to a much-desired shot at UFC lightweight champion Rafael dos Anjos. Gaethje, meanwhile, gets a shot at the title if he can win. He will need to win a three-man tournament to get the nod. Gaethje, at UFC 189, lost a razor-thin decision to Benson Henderson. The new bout order means that Dan Henderson and Lyoto Machida will fight for the interim middleweight championship in the co-main event. UFC on FOX 18 takes place at the Wells Fargo Center in Philadelphia. The main card will air on FOX following prelims on FS1 and UFC Fight Pass.
