The Manufacturing industry is a cornerstone of the United States economy. With a production output of nearly $2 trillion, the manufacturing industry provides goods and services that are vital to the daily lives of Americans. As a key player in the manufacturing sector, the medical device industry is responsible for producing a wide range of high-tech tools and equipment for the medical, veterinary, dental and research communities. The medical device industry creates products ranging from prescription drug delivery devices to surgical tools, intravenous drips and implants. As a relatively new industry, the medical device industry is still growing and changing, from the addition of new product categories to the diversification of product lines. However, the industry is also subject to high production costs and significant regulation, all of which are leading to an increased demand for medical device sales and technical support organizations. Some of the medical device sales and technical support organizations serve as a one-stop shop for providing all types of medical device-related services, while others specialize in just a few key areas, such as prescription drug delivery devices, implantable devices and surgical tools. The medical device industry has experienced a steady growth in sales, employment and manufacturing since the 1950s. With an estimated $3 trillion in annual sales, the medical device industry generated nearly a quarter-billion dollars in revenue in 2011. During this time, employment in the medical device industry has been growing as well, with the number of workers in the medical device industry doubling from 2008 to 2011. Due to the constant changes in the medical device industry, medical device sales and technical support organizations are in high demand, with the need for highly skilled workers also increasing. With experience and training, medical device sales and technical support professionals can expect to earn an average annual salary of $45,000, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The medical device industry is well-positioned to continue growing, as technology continues to improve and increase the demand for medical products. Still, the current economic environment has caused some companies to experience less-than-stellar performance, causing the demand for medical device sales and technical support organizations to also decline.
