Phenotypic analysis of Streptococcus infantarius sp. nov., a dairy cheese isolate of the genus Streptococcus. To characterize a dairy cheese isolate of the genus Streptococcus that showed lactic acid fermentation and a positive reaction to PYR test. The novel isolate was typified by using a series of phenotypic tests and comparative analysis of 16S rDNA sequences. Taxonomically characterized, the isolate was defined as a member of the genus Streptococcus and its closest relative was Streptococcus salivarius. The isolate was classified as a subspecies of S. salivarius. No homology was found to any of the type strains in the International Streptococcus Project database. The name Streptococcus infantarius sp. nov. is proposed. The novel isolate is a PYR-positive, lactic acid-fermenting, coagulase-negative strain of streptococci that is frequently recovered from artisanal dairy products such as cheese. It may be present in raw milk intended for cheesemaking. It may survive in dairy products and play a role in their manufacture, but its role in human and veterinary infections is unknown. The isolate is expected to be of value in studies of the lactose fermentation pathway in streptococci, metabolic activity of potential probiotic microorganisms, the role of streptococci in food products and their transmission to humans. [Appropriate indicators of child nutrition and development assessment for use in resource-poor settings]. There are various measurement strategies for child development such as comparison with standards based on national or international data, comparison with peers, or with a norm-referenced test. A study was conducted to determine the preferred assessment strategy in two specific 3e33713323
