These objects contain properties of the same type, and I need to persist each of them. That means that I have been trying to use a Session object to store the objects: public class Session { public List Things { get; set; } } This has been working very well, until I changed my application to access the database directly (using EF). Now, I am not sure how to make the List of Thing objects persistent. The Session class doesn't seem to be an appropriate data structure, since I have a List of Things in the Session object. I tried to make a GroupMember class for this: public class GroupMember { public string Group { get; set; } public List Things { get; set; } } and I would store my GroupMember objects in the Session object, but I am not sure how to make the List of Things persistent. The Entity Framework does not seem to be able to treat GroupMember objects as part of any collection. How can I make the List of Things persistent in my Session object? I am using Entity Framework 4.3.1 Code-First, and .NET 4.5. A: There are 3 options. Use a DTO and use the "lite" approach - see how to do this Use a service like AutoMapper and treat the Session object as a IEnumerable Use an entity that matches the design that you've described as both your Domain Model and your database model. The Entity Framework will be able to persist your data appropriately The third option is also very easy to work with once you've done it. Here's the code you would need to use: foreach (var session in sessions)
