Light is a very important environmental exposure for the visual system of humans. Epidemiologic studies on light-induced retinal degeneration are rare. We tested 265 patients with fundus-related diseases in the ophthalmology practice of the Departments of Ophthalmology and Biophysics. The same questionnaire was used for the control group of 130 persons. Three groups were examined: patients with retinitis pigmentosa (61 patients), patients with sudden and/or changeable vision loss (30 patients), and a control group (44 persons). Persons with retinitis pigmentosa are more often noted to have had their vision fluctuate than the patients with other diseases. The present series of patients with retinitis pigmentosa had their best vision between the ages of 20 and 40 years. The average age of these patients is 30 years. Males were predominant in both the case and control group. There are as many men as women in the case group, while in the control group the proportion of men was higher. A genetic factor is a possible explanation. Exposure to intense light is not more common among patients with retinitis pigmentosa than among the control group. About 5% of both the case and control group reported being exposed to intense light. A history of intense light exposure is not a risk factor for the development of retinitis pigmentosa. First case of stable non-familial Parkinson's disease treated with subthalamic nucleus deep brain stimulation. Deep brain stimulation (DBS) is an established treatment for patients with idiopathic Parkinson's disease d0c515b9f4
