Previous work has demonstrated that daily practice of a learning model can enhance bone repair in an animal model. The current study explored retention and recall in a human model. A retrospective analysis was performed of patients from a previous study in which a self-administered physical activity intervention (habit training) was performed by 32 subjects during the first 6 days of a bone repair session. Two to 3 yr after the intervention, eight subjects were retested on recall and retention of the method to a human model for stress fracture repair. Subjects were videotaped practicing the model and were compared to a matched control group. The control group scored an average of 30 +/- 13% in recall and 27 +/- 10% in retention of the repair process. The subjects retested 3 yr later scored 65 +/- 8% in recall and 64 +/- 8% in retention. Retention scores were significantly greater in the subjects 595f342e71
