There are plenty of solutions out there for detecting click events, but they all seem to require javascript (using onclick, onclick="..." etc). Is there anyway to detect which link (or any element, really) on the page was clicked without using javascript? A: Does the link have an onclick attribute? If so, it's a real onclick. If not, there's an onclick event handler on the document object, so you can check the href value of the clicked link. Laurence Kaptein Laurence Kaptein (born 29 November 1992) is a Dutch cyclist. Digital photography has become a ubiquitous part of modern life. It is no longer necessary to carry the bulky technology of film in a single device. Conventional digital single lens reflex (SLR) cameras are large, heavy and bulky devices. Smaller cameras lack the image quality found in conventional digital SLR cameras. Conventional cameras require a separate battery. The weight and size of the camera can limit the user's ability to carry the camera. Conventional cameras are expensive. The expense of such cameras is not compatible with the price range of lower end cameras. When viewing an image, at least one person (a "user") is needed in order to view the image. Typically a conventional camera requires two users—a photographer and an observer. Design and development The ND-620 was the first plane designed by Ken Kellen, a young engineer from Illinois with a background in aerospace research at the Hiller Aircraft Company. The prototype ND-620 first flew in 1934, and Kellen built at least one example of the type, the ND-620E. The ND-620 was a two-seat trainer biplane with a plywood-covered fuselage, and was powered by a 70 hp Lycoming O-290-C air-cooled flat-six engine. It had a retractable conventional undercarriage with mainwheels on a single axle and a tailskid. It was the first design to be built by Kellen. The first flight was in 1934, and the first flight from the factory was in 1935. Kellen moved to a new company, the Great Northern Aviation Company. The company was formed by former directors of the Kellen Aircraft Company and plans were laid to produce the ND-620 in 1940, although it may have already been produced as early as 1936, when Kellen's name 595f342e71
