This list has been updated for June 2020. Due to many changes (and it's quite a lot) I have decided to upgrade the writeup, add more info, and start from scratch. I've extended it from 4 to 8 screens now (while still maintaining a similar structure). Let's get to the top 5 best features of Photoshop. The capabilities of Photoshop are often misunderstood. It does not have all of the features of Photoshop CS but it does have a lot of them. There's always a curve to get new users started, and then to then help them acclimate to what Photoshop can do. Personally, I'd spend that money on the longer term. If you are already using Photoshop CS or professional editions of Photoshop – you probably know about these features already. So this article is different. If you are a very experienced user of Photoshop – I'd like to give you some interesting information about these features and how they can be helpful in your daily workflow. What would you add to your personal list? Let me know in the comments at the bottom of the article or post it on Reddit. Final Result In Different Layouts Let's say you want to make a banner for your team or organization. You can't use the stock SVG artwork for it. Photoshop let's you copy and paste the SVG logo image and apply it to the canvas with a few strokes of the magic wand, but that's about it. It's a simple, easy, and fast way to do it but if you want a more 'pro' looking banner you can't simply use the logo and output it as a file to print or set it in vector layers. As you can see, when I copy-paste the image to the canvas and hit the magic wand I get this: The problem is that the finished banner is not very nice. It's not bad, but not my best work either. I can't just use the logo in vector layers or cut it up into separate shapes. I want a final image that would look like this: It's not bad but I can do better. Another interesting way to make a banner would be to use the actual stock artwork. Let's say you have the standard Photoshop stock artwork of a rainbow.
