Two n-propyl analogs of these compounds, N-isopropyl-3-methoxy-4-phenyl-1,2,3,6-tetrahydropyridin-5-one (EMPT) and N-isopropyl-3-methoxy-4-phenyl-1,2,3,6-tetrahydropyridin-5-carboxamide (MPT), have been demonstrated to be efficacious clinically and potently inhibit the cyclooxygenase enzyme (i.e. COX-2) in vitro, exert anti-inflammatory activity both in animal models and in human trials, and are shown to be safe in clinical trials, with MPT being additionally shown to be a promising anti-neoplastic agent. One of the aspects of clinical pharmaceutical development that is the most time consuming and expensive is the process of ensuring that the drug is safely developed for its intended use, and that the drug does not have any unexpected and unwanted side effects. Most of the side effects of these drugs are attributed to the other potential pharmacological activities exhibited by these compounds, rather than to the side effects caused by the drug per se. For example, the narcotic analgesic activity of these compounds results in the potential for toxic side effects such as respiratory depression, constipation, nausea, vomiting, miosis and potentially other side effects. Another problematic aspect is that many of these analgesic compounds are metabolized in the liver, and yet may have a relatively narrow therapeutic
