This book includes a new analysis of the economic and social conditions of the period following the Mongol conquests. The findings show that for all areas of central Asia, it was the Mongol invasions that transformed the economic and political structures of the area. The key moment was the 'Mongolization' of the entire steppe zone – this was not simply the territory conquered by the Mongols, but rather a much broader, less densely settled region which was first raided by the Mongols and then appropriated by them. The Mongol conquests thus reshaped a much broader swath of Eurasia, creating a new "geographical economic space." (p. 2) The term “Mongolization” refers to the effects of the Mongol conquests, which in addition to transforming the economic and political structures of the area were also accompanied by major transformations in religion. Whereas the Mongol conquest had its roots in a mixture of military and religious innovations, the conquerors’ religion – Islam – was institutionalized during this period. (p. 2) The book also shows that the Mongol conquests shaped the economic conditions in the areas conquered by the Mongols, but also in the areas immediately to the north and south. In order to assess the consequences of the Mongol conquests, this study compares the three areas of the Mongol empire: Mongolia, Inner Mongolia and Khentii Khan, the steppe zone around the Caspian Sea. The areas in question were not always and not necessarily coterminous. Mongolia and Inner Mongolia were much larger than Khentii Khan and the latter included the territory of the Khalkha Khans, while Mongolia did not. The first areas to be transformed were the areas most closely linked to the Mongols, namely the regions of the capital cities (Kharkhorin, Karakorum and Karakorum). Kharkhorin (Kharka means “border” in Mongolian, the ancient capital of the Mongols) was the capital of the Chagatai Khanate, the central region of the Mongol Empire, which comprised the Khanates of Khiva, Bukhara, Qasir and Karakorum. The entire region around the capital was greatly
